An essay as an academic work gives the student the opportunity to express his or her own thoughts to the fullest extent, to reflect his or her personal thoughts and ideas about the world even if their source is only someone else's work, not individual experience. It is good to have a theme that resonates with the teacher (or an essay on a free theme), but this is not always the case and then problems arise when writing an essay. This article will tell you how to write an essay correctly. The structure of an essay is not quite standard. It should not contain a table of contents, a list of literature and sometimes even a title page. It is a free genre, which can be expressed by the author in any way he wants. The only condition that determines the structure of writing an essay is logic. Everything must be built on the laws of logic. The scheme of writing an essay does not change much regardless of its size and is preserved even in a mini essay. In spite of the fact that the essay has a free form, its structural features are present. First of all, they are conditioned by the requirements of this genre: All the author's thoughts should be presented in a thesis; each thesis should be supported by arguments. Arguments in this case are concrete well-known facts, events, phenomena, objects, scientifically proved facts, etc. Argument cannot be considered the phrase of the author: "My grandmother told me about it". References to books or films are appropriate. Average essay usually has a small size (standard volume several sheets of A4), begins with the statement of the problem, followed by the statement of several (usually three) theses and 2-3 arguments to these theses. All this ends with a general conclusion. An alternative form of text writing is also possible. Staging the problem remains unchanged. It is followed by the first thesis and arguments in its defense. And immediately there is a mini-examination on this thesis: Thesis ARGUMENT 1 ARGUMENT 2 ARGUMENT 3

CONCLUSION This sequence is repeated 2 or 3 times, depending on whether you operate with such a number of theses. And in the conclusion of this essay, there may not be a general conclusion. There is also a third variant of how to write an essay: to add the opinion of the opposite side and the justification of its error.

This type of composition is more thorough and serious. Essay plan Those who don't know where to start writing an essay can be recommended to make an essay plan in the first place. The plan reflects the future structure of an essay; the plan defines how to write an essay, serves as its framework. It is impossible to understand how to write an essay without first drawing up a plan. Although the plan may change (quite significantly) during the course of the work, it is necessary to draw up a plan before writing an essay. To make a plan, you need to study the topic.
